

Even in my highly urban area there are only two providers of last mile physical connectivity, but their broadband is still incomplete. Their development of this precious resource was monopoly protected, and to let them operate it in a monopolistic fashion when a competitive model has been proven and is thriving, would be completely un-American. The resulting collapse of the competitive ISP companies would handicap America's youth by denying them access to a tremendous educational resource, especially for the jobs of tomorrow.